The Institute of Economics Rangoon Burma (IERB) was founded in 1952 as a research institution dedicated to the study of the Burmese economy. The IERB has played a significant role in the development of economic policy in Burma, and its research has been widely cited by scholars and policymakers.

The IERB's research agenda is broad, covering a wide range of topics including macroeconomic policy, trade and investment, poverty and inequality, and environmental economics. The IERB's research is often policy-oriented, and its findings have been used to inform government decision-making.

In addition to its research work, the IERB also provides training and capacity building for economists in Burma. The IERB offers a range of courses and workshops, and it has also developed a number of teaching materials.

The IERB is a leading economic research institution in Burma. Its research has made a significant contribution to the understanding of the Burmese economy, and its findings have been used to inform government policymaking. The IERB is also committed to training and capacity building for economists in Burma.

The Political Economy of Burma

The political economy of Burma is complex and has been shaped by a number of factors, including the country's history, geography, and culture. Burma has a long history of colonialism, and its economy has been heavily influenced by foreign powers.

Burma's geography has also played a significant role in shaping its political economy. The country is located in Southeast Asia, and it shares borders with India, China, Thailand, Laos, and Bangladesh. Burma's location has made it a crossroads for trade and commerce, and it has also been a source of conflict.

Burma's culture has also influenced its political economy. The country is home to a diverse population of ethnic groups, and there has been a long history of tension between the different groups. This tension has often been reflected in the country's politics and economy.

The political economy of Burma is currently in a state of transition. The country is moving away from a centrally planned economy to a more market-oriented economy. This transition is being driven by a number of factors, including the country's need to attract foreign investment and the desire for greater economic growth.

The transition to a market economy is likely to have a significant impact on the political economy of Burma. It is likely to lead to greater economic growth, but it is also likely to increase inequality and social tension. The government will need to carefully manage the transition to ensure that the benefits of economic growth are widely shared.
