The story of Eugene Field Elementary is a testament to the power of one woman's perseverance and the importance of community. In the early 1900s, a young woman named Sarah Platt Decker set out to create a school for the children of migrant workers in Southern California. Despite facing many challenges, Decker's vision eventually became a reality, and Eugene Field Elementary opened its doors in 1924.

Decker was born in Illinois in 1866. She moved to California with her family in 1888, and she quickly became aware of the plight of the migrant workers who lived in the area. These workers were often poor and illiterate, and their children had little access to education. Decker was determined to provide these children with a better future, and she began to teach them in her own home.

In 1912, Decker founded the Migrant Education Fund. This organization provided financial assistance to migrant workers and their families, and it also helped to establish schools for migrant children. In 1924, Decker's dream of a permanent school for migrant children became a reality when Eugene Field Elementary opened its doors.

The school was named after Eugene Field, a popular American poet who was known for his love of children. Field was a strong advocate for education, and he would have been proud to know that a school was named in his honor.

Eugene Field Elementary quickly became a vital part of the community. The school provided education and support to generations of students, and it helped to break the cycle of poverty for many families.

Today, Eugene Field Elementary continues to thrive. The school has a strong academic program, and it offers a variety of extracurricular activities for its students. The school also has a strong sense of community, and it is supported by a dedicated staff and a caring community.
