Turki was born in Cairo, Egypt, in 1940. He was raised in a devout Muslim family, and he attended a religious school. As a young man, Turki was a strong believer in Islam. He studied the Qur'an and the Hadith, and he followed the Five Pillars of Islam. He believed that Islam was the one true religion, and he was proud to be a Muslim.

However, Turki's faith began to waver after he moved to the United States to study. He was exposed to new ideas and perspectives, and he began to question some of the traditional beliefs of Islam. He also became aware of the human rights abuses that were being committed in the name of Islam.

Turki was deeply troubled by what he saw, and he began to speak out against the oppression and violence that was being carried out in the name of his religion.

Turki's outspokenness made him a target of the Egyptian government. He was arrested and tortured, and he was eventually forced to flee the country. He moved to the United States, where he continued to write and speak out against the abuses that were being committed in the name of Islam. Turki's work has been praised by many human rights activists and scholars, but he has also been criticized by some Muslims who believe that he is a traitor to his faith.

Despite the criticism, Turki has continued to speak out against the oppression and violence that is being carried out in the name of Islam. He believes that it is his duty to speak out for the voiceless, and he hopes that his work will help to create a more just and tolerant world.
