In a small town in the Midwest, there was a young boy named Billy. Billy was a kind and gentle soul, but he was also shy and introverted. This made him an easy target for bullies.

Every day, Billy would be taunted and harassed by the other children. They would call him names, make fun of his clothes, and even push him around. Billy tried to ignore them, but it was difficult. He started to feel ashamed of himself and began to withdraw from the world.

Billy's parents were concerned about him. They could see that he was unhappy, but they didn't know what to do. They tried talking to him, but he wouldn't open up. Finally, they decided to take him to a therapist.

The therapist helped Billy to understand that he was not to blame for the bullying. He also helped Billy to develop coping mechanisms for dealing with the bullies.

Billy started to feel better about himself. He began to stand up to the bullies and refuse to let them get to him. The bullies were surprised by Billy's newfound confidence. They had never seen him fight back before.

Eventually, the bullies gave up. They realized that Billy was not going to let them get to him anymore. Billy had finally found his voice.

Billy went on to graduate from high school and college. He got a good job and married a wonderful woman. He had a happy and successful life.
